

Real competition in broadband services requires a decoupling of the provision of the low-tech physical wire and the provision of signal processing and services over the wire. Ideally, municipalities should be allowed and encouraged to own all physical wiring, and communications companies would compete for the provision of protocols and services. Otherwise, the enormous costs of entering the market prevent real competition.

Sincerely,

Kevin Murphy